

Problems we are seeking to address

Unequal power structures and top-down governance limit community leadership and shared accountability of decision making.

Education, training and employment pathways are misaligned with the needs of employers and industry and are failing to prepare young people for decent and meaningful work.

Young people face discrimination and are not meaningfully engaged in decision-making that affects them, leading to policies and programs that are not fit-for-purpose.

Social infrastructure, including transport, housing, and health services, are siloed and fragmented. It inadequately meets the wellbeing needs of community and deepens inequalities.

Employers and industry operate within systems that prioritise profits over long-term sustainability. This disincentivises investment in the social and economic value of young people.
